Running tests for an application with some private packages I'm developing an application and I have created a test for it using JUnit 5. This application uses a package named "com.example.app" which contains some code that I'd rather not share with other tests in my project. Is there a way to include this package in the test and exclude it from the code under test? In short, I'm asking if there is a possibility to isolate this package from the application code. A: You can create a test project to store all of your test related code in and for the rest of the app you can use Maven's include-pom-in-dependency-section plugin to avoid including the packages into the test project. You can then make use of Inclusions to get the classes you want into the test. org.example example_test 1.0-SNAPSHOT test pom commons-io commons-io This will automatically include all of the classes in the example_test artifact. See the maven-dependency-plugin reference for more details. This method is not always desirable
