At the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, at least, doing research has ethical overtones. What goes on in the lab, in the dorms, and in the net can have major effects on your future, even if what you do is of academic interest. Yet many researchers often receive little or no formal instruction on ethical conduct, and there are few, if any, policies to govern how to best conduct oneself online. This two-session course will introduce you to the myriad issues in academic ethics, and help you apply them to your digital life. Topics will include how to be a good academic and a responsible user of the web, issues to consider when conducting research, tips for safe data management, and how to be a better citizen and a better digital citizen.
