GIMP GIMP, or GNU Image Manipulation Program, is a free version of Photoshop. The first version came in 1994, and a new release is released every six months. However, most of the features in the latest release have been available since version 2.0 was released in 1998. GIMP may not have the features of a professional program, but it has some unique benefits, including its plug-in architecture. GIMP supports many graphic formats and a wide range of file formats. It can manipulate layers much as Photoshop does, but it handles layers differently. If you feel more comfortable working in a layer-based program, you may find that GIMP is a better option than Photoshop. GIMP does not have the widest support for colorspace management, file format management, and channel management as Photoshop does, but it does have many of these features. Adobe promotes Photoshop as the premier image-manipulation program in the industry; however, its proprietary nature presents one stumbling block for users who want to share files. GIMP has yet to achieve the same level of popularity and market dominance as Photoshop, but it is a fine piece of software in its own right, and many knowledgeable users consider GIMP to be an excellent alternative to Photoshop. * For beginners, One-Click Photoshop GIMP (`www.halftonepress.com`): This book teaches the reader how to create images using Photoshop and GIMP. * GIMP User Guide (`www.gimp.org/docs`): A brief and easy-to-follow tutorial on how to use GIMP. * GIMP 2-D Tutorial: A tutorial that shows readers how to create an image by creating one layer, applying adjustments on that layer, applying adjustments to one or more other layers, and reducing the image's size.

Q: Radio Button selection only have 1 choice I have a form with a radio button list that has only 2 choices. Select "Clarity" or "Saturated" Clarity: Clarity Saturation: Saturation Add My problem is that when it is loaded in Google Chrome the option "Clarity" is selected. It used to be fine when I had more choices. A: The issue in your code is that you did not bind your radio buttons to an event handler. When you add a required attribute, it has to be on the input element itself (aka the button in this case). For example: As you stated, you have to bind to onchange event. Also: Clarity: Clarity Saturation:

Q: Is it possible to override "getters" and "setters" for custom properties with a TypeScript type declaration? I am using TypeScript and I have defined an interface as below: export interface Deck { // Do something } Then I declare my own custom property, for which I want to have getters/setters: export interface Deck { public CustomProperty: number | null = null; } How can I use that property to be able to have the following: this.deck.CustomProperty = null; // Property 'CustomProperty' is missing in type 'Deck'. I know I can do that like this: public CustomProperty: number | null = null; But I would like to have a more strongly typed solution... A: Just make your CustomProperty optional: export interface Deck { CustomProperty?: number | null; } And you can use null if the property is not initialized: this.deck.CustomProperty = null; Or if you want to initialize CustomProperty automatically, you can use optional chaining as: this.deck?.CustomProperty = null; How to Catch it on Camera When a Raccoon Casts. What you need: a standard magnifying glass, water (if the predator is still in the area), and of course, your camera. As stated earlier, a magnifying glass will help you, but if it isn't around, don't worry. You can help catch the raccoon or other predator casting by taking turns with a neighbor. If one of you get the shot, the other can take a picture and the first person can then add the image to their collection of images from that location. For some locations, (including ponds, springs, lakefront property, roofing or other building wraps around the landscape, and more), it will likely be necessary to sweep an area with a large stick. If that doesn't work, a shotgun or firearm is a great way to ensure you get that image you've been wanting for so long. "It's happened before." "I can get you some help." "I'm sure you can." "Now if we can just get them to listen..." "There are rules." "We're journalists." "We follow them." "And you're in fucking Britain." "So
