The mechanisms of hyaluronate (HA) interaction with biliary ductal cells were investigated. Only a small fraction of the high-molecular weight HA-binding proteins (MW 120-200 kD) in bile from either perfused or duct-ligated animals were found to be associated with the cell surface or released into bile by lysis of the cells. No translocation of these proteins to the nucleus occurred after exposure of cells to either alpha- or beta-taurocholate, and no inhibition of HA binding was detected in cells pretreated with x-ray-induced microaggregates. The high-molecular weight HA-binding proteins, identified as keratinocyte type II and -IV, and liver microvillus proteins in biliary cells, were shown to be present in plasma membranes isolated from bile duct epithelial cells. Western blot analysis of the latter demonstrated the presence of keratinocyte type II, -IV, and -5, in descending order of abundance, in plasma membranes of bile duct epithelial cells, which was confirmed by immunocytochemical staining of the three proteins and translation of radiolabeled keratinocyte type II and -IV peptide templates in vitro. High-molecular weight HA binding and HAase activity were both found to be decreased after treatment of liver plasma membranes with trypsin. The results suggested that HA binding to biliary ductal cells is probably mediated by plasma membrane-associated HA-binding proteins which are susceptible to proteolytic degradation by trypsin.Q: JS repeat while input empty I'm trying to write a script in JS which should repeat while a input is empty.
