Pinochle (also called "the house game" or "the bridge game") is a card game originally played by Italian immigrants in the United States, and later spread worldwide. It is played with a 52-card pack of playing cards, using a standard deck without jokers, and a standard playing board. Each player owns a stock of playing cards, usually in fours, with each player receiving five playing cards. Beginning from the king down, the cards rank in descending order. The game uses a hierarchical set of wagering rules called "martingale" that is used to discourage players from becoming hopelessly long-stacked. Gameplay The player with the highest card points at the end of a play wins the hand. The highest card value in a hand determines who, between the two players in each round, may claim that round as a draw to proceed to the next. The winner of the hand then decides whether to discard from his hand and play again (using the cards still remaining in his hand), or to drop out and play a new hand. This Game is basically based on Cartoon Network's Cartoon Show. The player has to find the hidden picture on each level by looking for the preview squares which are placed a little bit below the images. If the player sees the preview square, then the player can click on the preview square to go to the next level. ### What's new:

Hunt Outlaws: Corwin's Treasure Hunt is a computer game in development by Intellivision and was to be published by Activision. It was to be their first Intellivision game. It was later cancelled when Activision and Intellivision failed to come to an agreement regarding the deal.

Gameplay Outlaws: Corwin's Treasure Hunt is similar to F-16: Viper Strike in concept. Players would be dropped into 20 missions in six areas of the world and choose their location and team to run the missions. Five missions would serve as a tutorial before setting up for the fifth mission in which all four playable pilots would go out. Enemies would hide to be destroyed in this fifth mission. Multiplayer In a multiplayer game mode, it is not possible to win on a "don't care" basis. A player must attempt to cover all of the objectives for a given time limit, while doing as much damage to enemies as possible. The popularity of ARG mentioned above would have been evident to people such as Activision CEO Mike Capobianco, who was under the impression that Activision was planning on exploiting the game's loose ties to the ARG. When Capobianco became aware of this, he consequently canceled the deal, which also removed the game from the schedule and eventually the map tiles for the game were returned to Intellivision.

GameRankings.IGN.com had a mixed to negative reception to it. Here are some of the comments they made: "The best thing about this game are the RPG elements that it has: Every mission has a simple storyline with no "plot twists," and each mission has some trading possibilities, skill points, and stats to appeal to the RPG players out there. Overall, though, the AI is so simple it's almost pathetic. They advance on your in formations during certain scenarios; they fan out to spread out or close in. What's more, you can actually see their grids appearing onscreen when using the radar! But besides the tedious AI, your gun-happy rivals are anything but honest. They attack your fleet of choppers and will even depart you for enemy bases, leaving you vulnerable to aerial attacks. There is a lot to do out there. The story in itself is good, but the game takes itself way too seriously to have fun. But
