Preview Chapter 1 In the beginning... there was darkness. The world was, after all, a world of darkness. There was no red, no purple, no yellow, no blue, no any other color. All was black. Slowly, as time passed, the once-dark planet became a world of light, studded with sunlight, and as it became more and more apparent that there was only the blackness of night, it became more and more obvious that the light was coming from stars. Within a few thousand years, stars everywhere in space were turning on, creating tiny lights everywhere. But dark regions remained, isolated regions where stars never came out of the atmosphere. They also discovered that they were born on the surface of the earth. People then continued to develop technology. A civilization. A world with no technology. Technology was critical for the development of humanity. The existence of technology is a step towards the advancement of the development of humans as a species. Long, long ago, humans became less and less dependent on technologies. Later, when humanity arose, technology continued to improve. But humans remained on Earth. * * * The story starts not with the rise of civilization, but rather with the rise of people. People were living with animals and plants. Humans lived in the same place as all animals and plants, and were feeding off of their food. However, there was also evidence to show that they had animal and plant cultures. There was also evidence that seemed to prove they
