Shoulder injuries in American football players. Shoulder injuries among football players have been evaluated in the literature only since the 1950s. The aim of this study was to evaluate the shoulder injuries sustained by football players in North America and investigate the sport's contribution to these injuries. The National Football League Injury Surveillance System database was used to identify shoulder injuries sustained by all players over an 8-year period beginning in 2004. Injuries were recorded if they occurred during a game, practice, or training. Three-hundred sixty shoulder injuries were found in 358 players (13.5 per 100 athletes). There were 237 (64.7%) contact/collision injuries and 123 (34.0%) strains/sprains. The injury incidence rate was 2.2 per 100 athlete-exposures (AEs) and varied by position: 0.3 to 3.4 for offensive linemen, 0.6 to 6.4 for defensive linemen, 1.7 to 8.7 for linebackers, 0.7 to 8.5 for safeties, and 0.2 to 3.5 for cornerbacks. The shoulder injury rate (per 100 AEs) for players (and their corresponding rates per 100 AEs by position) was as follows: offensive linemen, 3.3 (1.6); defensive linemen, 9.6 (5.3); linebackers, 8.6 (7.0); safeties, 9.4 (8.7); and cornerbacks, 4.4 (1.5). The shoulder injury rate among offensive linemen was significant compared with that of defensive linemen (P Treatment of lead-exposed thalidomide-exposed infants.
