I was thinking of maybe something like Computer Programmer - Very experienced, which is strong Solid - Probably, depending on the situation Proficient - No experience required Not as strong Buggy - Only used in small-scale projects? Quick - Only from time to time Unreliable - No experience needed I think the main problem is, when I write my skills, I think it is obvious which are strong and which are weak. But I don't know how to phrase it. How would you describe the skills and weaknesses on a resume? A: I always use a simple, concise, and honest sentence. It's not always possible to tell a good story with a resume, and don't complicate matters when it can be avoided. You don't want the reader to think of you as a liar. It is better to just tell it all and let the reader decide. Your curriculum vitae is your opportunity to explain your experiences, and what you learned in those experiences. If you have no experience, then just list it as such. If you have experience, then explain. You don't have to go into a lot of detail. I'm not a fan of bold lettering on a resume. I also don't think a resume should be a sales pitch. If there are things on there that are bad, then you shouldn't use it. It is your attempt to explain yourself to an employer, so be clear and concise. I'd have no problems reading this: "Computer programmer", "Very experienced" "Solid" "Quick" "Unreliable" "Buggy" A: Be honest. If you can't tell the difference between a good program and
