If detectable in the nonpregnant population, the presence of MAU in pregnancy indicates that this state may be a risk for the mother. The purpose of this paper is to review the literature concerning MAU in pregnancy. We performed an extensive MEDLINE search with the key words MAU, abnormal proteinuria, pregnancy, and proteinuria. Papers were selected if they were in English, were of primary research, and presented original data. Various aspects concerning the occurrence of MAU in pregnancy were reviewed, and the literature was critically evaluated. Studies from the U.S.A. showed that, in women with essential hypertension, MAU occurs in approximately 5% of pregnancies and precedes the onset of proteinuria. The MAU appears to originate in the glomerulus rather than in the renal vasculature.

Polymorphonuclear neutrophils are involved in the development of MAU. Furthermore, the hemodynamic changes occurring in pregnancy cause an enhancement of glomerular permeability. In pregnancies in which MAU is initially absent, it can occur in 15-20% of the cases. The occurrence of MAU increases with advancing gestational age. MAU can be detected in the third trimester of pregnancy. With the exception of gestational diabetes, MAU is not a marker of pregestational morbidity in pregnancy. However, MAU seems to be associated with complications. Detection of MAU in pregnancy should prompt investigation for a primary renal disease. You are here Statue of Grover Cleveland by John Graham (1895) The following is from the Smithsonian American Art Museum's online database and is available here: About John Graham Born in 1866 in Charlottesville, Virginia, John Graham (1866-1947) became the most prolific and influential American sculptor of his generation. Believing that the designs of the great French sculptor Auguste Rodin were the key to a universal appreciation of art, Graham spent the last half of the nineteenth century in Paris, where he continued his studies of anatomy, art history
