When using a Code 128 barcode font in office applications like Word or Excel, you can't just simply select your numbers and change the font. Instead, you will have to format your data by adding start and stop symbols and a check digit. Usually a macro, add-in, or stand-alone app will be supplied with the font that converts your data for the font and calculates a check digit. I was so excited when I could print various bar codes by using the 3of9 font in Excel. With the self-made bar code, I can encode every shelf in the stockroom to better monitor stock movement with a handheld scanner. I really had (and still have) no clue why IT dept wont be able to do so ~_~ For reference we are including the bar patterns of the three start- and the single stop-character here. When using a Code 128 barcode font in Excel or similar applications, the start and stop characters will be mapped to certain character positions; however, the mapping is not standardized and will vary from font to font. As we mentioned before, SSRS uses barcode fonts for printing barcodes, which is not a reliable approach especially for 2D barcodes. Docentric AX designer automatically generates a vector barcode image for the selected data from the report data source and the selected barcode symbology.

The code in the comments is not crucial, but if you need to use a vector image you have to use a vector-based font for the report. The attribute will be empty if the Barcode attribute is not available. Create a new shared variable BarcodeInt and set its value with the following code: Before printing, a barcode font also needs to be loaded on the computer. Unlike the design of the barcode, a font consists of a table of numbers that consist of different character widths. For most barcode fonts, you can simply add 1 to the width of each character. This means that if the decimal system is used, each character will have to have a width of a 7 digits string. We will use this value below for the
