All for Love (Amar Y Vivir) Colombian, 69 episodes series. Im fluent in Italian wanting to improve my high school Spanish and by watching so many Spanish speaking shows, I can honestly say that I dont need the subtitles any more. Ive binged on Luis Miguel, Velvet, La chicas del Cable, Morocco in the times of War and Silvana sin Lana which has hardly any nudity nor violence. I liked how I could listen to it while working and not get distracted. I was thinking about everything in the play that I think was important and realized a lot about the older generation. I thought it was interesting how a family with a young daughter would get involved with the mafia. I liked all the characters except for Villanueva. I don't like when the girls keep secrets from the mother like she wasn't there and "no way did I just say that." I also wanted to see where Jesse goes after she leaves Eloisa's house in the last chapter. I loved Eloisa in the play but in the book she was cold and distant. I want to know what happens to the girls after their mother dies. I liked the ending. I hope I get to read some more of the author's work. Thanks for sharing. :) The horrors of war are depicted in an achingly slow, beautifully acted and intensely emotional way. Written by Closet Monster in Japanese and English, this gives a glimpse of life in Nazi occupied Poland in 1944. Based on true events, this series explores the growth of drug cartels, beginning with the rise of Pablo Escobar in Colombia. Theres a mix of English and Spanish as the story is told through the eyes of DEA agent Steve Murphy and his team. This is obviously a violent show about a difficult part of history, but also a very high-quality and nuanced look into the relations between the DEA, Latin American governments, and cartels.

Over the past year, FluentU has gone to a model that gives you a vocabulary path to use right from the beginning of your lesson. And you can adapt the pace to your own needs. By some of the vocabulary each week, you'll be ready to listen to a sentence and be able to follow along with subtitles. If you're a bit further along, just speed things up. If your last language learning experience was when you went through the Hindi or Portuguese courses that were offered at your local community college or university, you might have been disappointed. These introductory or beginner courses are often old-fashioned (translation, one keystroke, no nuance), and many are also cumbersome and take way too long to get through. The granddaddy of them all, New English V-log , is the only one that actually teaches you to read English at a very high level, but that requires (and costs) monthly membership. If youre a lifelong learner and have trouble finding an online community, you might want to consider what an old-fashioned coffee shop or diner in your town might offer as a way to meet other English speakers. Television on the internet is another good option, if it appears on your newscasts. If you can manage it, visiting a coworker or friend in a country that uses your language is the best way to get up to speed with your native tongue. There are plenty of resources to help you. Google Translate can be useful, especially for texting, but it wont create close enough equivalents. Duolingo can take some of the load off, but requires you to learn a language that is close to English (Spanish is good, but not necessarily great). Rosetta Stone has a combo option that includes videos, as does Memrise. All of these are a good fit if you want to truly get acclimated to another language without having to learn an entirely new one.
