The VMware Cloud service will automatically scale up any stretched cluster on AZ failure. This capability is added free of charge and will attempt to maintain the Compute resources in the event of an AZ failure by adding non-billable hosts to the surviving AZ until the cluster has returned to its original host count. Upon AZ recovery the cluster will automatically Scale-In as soon as the burst capacity is no longer needed. This functionality is dependent on free capacity and therefore carries no guarantee. This protection extends to partial failures as well. Should an instance fail on a Stretched Cluster and Auto-Remediation is unable to recover or replace the host. The service will add the instance to the other AZ until a new host can be recovered in the original AZ. This capability is added free of charge and will attempt to maintain the Compute resources in the event of a partial AZ failure by adding non-billable hosts to the surviving AZ until the cluster has returned to its original host count. You must deploy at least one additional vSphere Replication Server per site where the total number of incoming or outgoing replications exceeds 500. Please consult the VMware Site Recovery documentation for guidance on how to deploy these additional components. You may also have to modify your on-premises firewall configuration to allow incoming/outgoing traffic to or from the additional vSphere Replication Server(s). On the other hand, to replicate more than 500 VMs to or from a VMware Cloud on AWS SDDC, you do not need to install or configure any additional components. When the number of replications in a VMware Cloud on AWS SDDC reaches a certain default threshold, the VMware Site Recovery service will automatically add an additional vSphere Replication Server to the SDDC and seamlessly extend the existing vSphere Replication firewall configuration of that SDDC to the new server. 5ec8ef588b
