The word "extraordinary" gets tossed around a lot. When we hear it, we tend to think it applies to an athlete who just finished a trip around the world in an attempt to prove that he or she is better than everyone else. In reality, the word "extraordinary" has an even more humble definition. It means a person whose actions and choices over the course of their life are unusual. Alexis Tschantretou is a teenage Iranian boy who has been diagnosed with a rare condition called Pallister-Killian syndrome. The condition, which was discovered in 1975, occurs in one out of every four million births. Symptoms include mental retardation, facial abnormalities, a club-shaped head, limb defects, bone and heart abnormalities and, sometimes, other malformations. For most people, Pallister-Killian syndrome would mean a life that is far from normal. For Alexis, it has been a life that has come with some unique challenges, but also with some truly extraordinary things. I had the opportunity to sit down with Alexis and ask him some questions about his condition.

Michael Vincent Mays: We can't really understand what it's like to have a condition like yours. Can you explain to people in our generation what it is like for you to be so different from everyone else? Alexis Tschantretou: I don't think that people can really understand what it's like because they don't have the condition, so it's hard for them to relate. I think that the most important thing is to accept it and be comfortable in your own skin.
