Seriously though, this software is a fine tool in many respects. The engine behind the application, the RIP Engine/Script (or whatever it's called by the time you read this), is a wonderful tool with some great built-in magic. And of course, its user interface is top-notch, offering intuitive controls at the click of a button. All that said, I am somewhat surprised that the application continues to be so bloated. Every time I load Adobe Photoshop for the first time, I feel like I'm getting in a fight with a 300-pound steer. The differences in application sizes are notable. I don't see why the company couldn't easily slim the application down. It would make for a better experience. Then again, that would require more development resources. Photoshop is probably the most well-known piece of software on the planet when it comes to photo editors. All I can say is that I'm pleased to have an application of this caliber included in the iPad Pro sale only the Pro model can stand up and draw attention. To this day, only the top-tier models boast a screen that's large enough to be called a canvas. I love that the iPad Pro makes good use of machine learning, where the software is retrained for the 8.4-inch display, even though I would welcome a bit more adjustment in the process. Really though, Apple has made these apps capable of amazing things, especially if one has content that needs to be processed. There is something very nice about the iPad Pro racing to get images out of one's camera. And thanks to the WYSIWYG capabilities of the apps, a user doesn't have to worry about making mistakes. Of course, there are plenty of other platforms out there that can boast the same capabilities.
