Also, yes, Adobe is now including the Cloud Libraries feature. This is a really welcome feature. Adobe has been offering this for a couple of versions, but now we know where it was taken from. It is almost like Lightroom is stealing from Photoshop! Another welcome addition is the ability to link a photo directly from the app to a web page with the added bonus of being able to include it in a web gallery. As an added bonus, if you are already saving the photo in a web archive, you no longer have to risk leaving the photo on your machine. And this capability should naturally extend to the course of time. At any rate, the Google Photos integration is quick and simple and it works well. For those imagery professionals that use Adobe's Lightroom, the addition of image stabilization is a welcome one. Now enabling some of the adjustments in Lightroom or Photoshop will result in the stabilization being applied to all of the images. Of course, you can also separately apply it to specific images if you prefer, or not. Another nice thing is that the adjustments will stay with the images. So, if the images are exported, the specific adjustments already applied will be applied to the exported images. There is also a new setting where you can turn off the Stabilization after the 10 iterations have elapsed. That is a good choice for Live View work. That's not a bug. It's just how it looks. This is a problem that has plagued Lightroom as well, though since it is an adjustment and not a creative feature, it has mostly been less of a problem. That's not to say you can't subtract a person's face from a scene, but having to do so manually is something I never quite got used to. It is still not the case, however, that Photoshop has to have Photoshop as its parent. A better feature would be to have the application "piggyback" on the file's extensions. It does the same thing as the Duplicate option, only it copies the file with the same extensions and file name as the original.
