While I'm not quite ready to move to Lightroom - I understand that Adobe has taken the best parts of both products, incorporated the best features from Aperture and has updated the program to remain relevant in an era of great photography software by Apple and DxO. I've been fortunate to evaluate Lightroom 1.3 and 1.4 Beta. Lightroom 1.4 is a solid update as far as I can tell. This update adds lightroom tuning and processing of RAW files. There is new processing film and an updated editing tool kit. In my opinion, this is the strongest version of Lightroom at this time. The video function is quite a bit different than when I first tested it. It's much more integrated, and you don't have to make it yourself. It's also easier to use if you want to view an entire clip or quickly jump around. But I do miss customizing the time, effects, and color tables that used to be in the options menu. And the "Polaroid"-style grid is quite annoying, especially with monitors that are finding it difficult to adjust. There's a 3D effect, but I would have liked to be able to customize it. And the Photoshop Share for Review feature still hasn't landed. But, the video output is much improved. Deep integration with mobile devices, including iPhones and iPads, with new features for Retouching and Designing for your phone. Also includes Lightroom integration and TouchRetouch for Retouching and Photoshop Elements integration for Designing. Lightroom integration for Photoshop fills in for using Photoshop Elements and provides a familiar experience for people who have used Lightroom. It offers design and sharing capabilities, one-click access to retouching tools and more.
