When the number of variables is large, the situation of a case with poor prognosis can be evaluated by establishing an evaluation criterion for each variable. If the information on the survival period is known, then the evaluation criterion can be created by statistical methods. However, if the information is not known, then the evaluation criterion can be created by collecting the prognostic information from an expert. Therefore, it is assumed that the prognostic information is collected from at least two experts. In this study, the authors propose that the experts be asked to evaluate the prognosis for each variable. To this end, an evaluation criterion is defined using the information collected. Through numerical simulations, the authors show that the use of two experts is superior to the use of one expert. The method proposed
