Folks, did I say that this update was a big deal I hear big alarm bells ringing and start talking about some new, devastating features on its way. In this case, I refer to a new object-based image browser. This is a feature that Photoshop sorely lacked initially. Initially, Lightroom did not support creating as many catalogs as we needed. We did have Faves, however, and the combination of that and tags made Lightroom feature-rich. We have now turned this feature-richness around and turned Photoshop into a powerful object browser. Of course, we can still use the product as simply a gallery, but more importantly, the browser also includes a set of filters that allow us to instantly improve an image we just found. To enable object-based browsing, we move the images into specific sub-folders on the computer hard disk. The idea is that we can turn our eyes directly on the image, regardless of its location on the disk, and continue editing it in the main image library. It is also possible to edit the image with many different apps, which means that there is no need to switch to a specific edit tool first, and to save it before discarding the current version. If we ended up getting used to editing images in this way, this would be a great improvement. It works well, although it can be a bit difficult to reach the image if you want to locate it, given that the vectors are no longer stacked. The search function is also quite slow. In any case, Lightroom 5 can handle large photo collections that we create for our clients. Those who do not want to bother with the object browser can still use a bitmap image browser—a traditional approach to Lightroom.

What It Does: There are many ways to make your images look cleaner, one of which is Spot Healing. This lets you find and remove spots (like flaws) in your image, leaving the rest of the image undisturbed. You can use the Content-Aware Fill tool occasionally to fill areas with the same background color that's nearest to the spot or object that you're trying to fix. Or you can use the

Reinforce Content tool to add texture to areas of your image by digging into its pixels and copying the tone of the nearest object, often the sky. What It Does: The Spot Healing Brush was designed to find and seamlessly correct small imperfections in your artwork. This tool lets you define the areas you want to heal, then analyzes the whole image to determine the best spot to use to fix the object without destroying something else. If you want to change the brightness or color temperature of an image, you can use the Curves Adjustment Layer. This tool lets you adjust the brightness, contrast, and hue and/or saturation of the entire photo, or just select a specific area if you'd like to adjust it only. What It Does: Adjustments work in a similar way to toning, where you apply a specific color to a specific area of your artwork. The Adjustments tool is similar to the Curves tool, but it offers more precise control over the color you choose. One of the most popular ways to make your photos look more vibrant is to use the Hue/Saturation tool. This tool can make a photo look more colorful by increasing the saturation—making it brighter—and less colorful by decreasing the saturation (which makes it more dull). e3d0a04c9c
