In Lightroom 5, you can now choose from a hardware-supported color space, including sRGB, Adobe RGB, and ProRes (Apple-dubbed ProResRAW). I've discovered the benefits of sRGB, which provides a grayscale, balanced image at the highest quality. If you're shooting JPEGs, I suggest sticking with this color space. Not only does it offer the most efficient file size, but it also provides the appearance of consistent light across the project. Professionals will benefit from Adobe RGB, which will give the most accurate color gamut for calibrated capture. If you're shooting RAW, you'll need to check your camera for hardware calibration settings. Avoid shooting RAW in sRGB, as the gamma shift can make for inferior results. There are two color spaces that have become popular with many photographers, ProRes and Apple ProRes. Both have their own merits; Apple ProRes can be faster, smaller, and sharper in image detail than the the new ProRes RAW format. It's a set of technology from Apple that offers some advantages in noise reduction, color management, and dynamic range support. The downside, however, is the extra time it takes to convert to the final image, compress it, and upload. ProRes is considered neutral in color, which makes it well-suited for printing and converting into other formats (such as JPEG, TIFF, and Adobe PNG). It requires higher-end cameras due to its 8-bit format and codec support. We've seen a rise in the use of ProRes, as "converters" such as ColorCo and Adobe Media Encoder, and newcomers such as 2 stabilized to ProRes by key application makers such as Apple and Adobe, allow for higher-quality video editing and even TV production. If you're shooting any type of video, some of the most effective techniques that you can pursue are especially beneficial.
