This invention relates to a method of etching a substrate with a chemically reactive species, and to an apparatus for carrying out the method. In conventional CVD processing (chemical vapor deposition) all of the chemical reactants are introduced into a chamber in the same flow. In atomic layer deposition, a thin film is grown during sequential deposition of reactant materials. The thickness is measured by how many reactants are available to form a monolayer. In conventional plasma enhanced chemical vapor deposition, the plasma is activated. In chemical mechanical polishing, the polishing is achieved by dispersing particles and rotating a substrate with grits at the substrate surface. In reactive ion etching, ions are accelerated towards a surface to be etched, and the etchant species are dissociated or ionized at the surface. Q: Total trust, shared or total shared authentication I am confused by this. I came across this article "When you implement a two-factor authorization with AD FS, your claim-based app must provide its own token-based authentication mode or it will fail. A token-based authentication mode is a special type of authentication that is based on the concept of a token—a device-specific piece of information that is secret and provides access only to a specific resource. If a user authenticates with an app by presenting a token that contains a unique identifier for a claim, no other token-based authentication mechanism is required. This means that the following two scenarios are valid: You have a shared secret token-based authentication mode and you provide a claim-based authentication through the AdfsAuthority.AuthorizeRequest operation. You have a total trust token-based authentication mode and you provide a claim-based authentication through the AdfsAuthorizeRequest operation. "
